

iQuest Chase

your Dreams

How many of us longed to chase a childhood dream, such as becoming a professional athlete, dancer, or performer, but found it impossible to pursue that passion because our school schedules simply didn't allow for the travel or practice time required? Times have changed. Today a new alternative exists: Pisgah's innovative iQuest program.

iQuest students attend school in the mornings and are then free to practice their craft. The program provides Pisgah's rigorous college preparatory education, with schedule flexibility. It also allows the student to remain in the school environment with the chance to attend proms, football games, interact socially with their peers and remain in a Christian environment.

For a dozen Pisgah students, including Billy Kennerly and Meghan Lacey, iQuest is an answer to prayer. "I think the program will help me reach my goal of playing on the PGA tour because it will allow me to have more time to be able to do what I want to do," said nationally ranked golfer and Pisgah sophomore Billy Kennerly. "Once we lose daylight savings time, it's really hard to get a round or a good practice in after school," said Billy's father, Keith Kennerly. "By getting out of school earlier Billy will be on par with the kids he is playing in tournaments against." The iQuest program also allows Billy to miss school to attend those tournaments, which are usually scattered around the Southeast.

iQuest allows junior Meghan Lacey to pursue her dream of dancing with a professional ballet company and someday owning a dance school for underprivileged and special needs children. "I thoroughly enjoy the iQuest program. Between the wonderful teachers, stellar environment, and the unique friendships I have made with all the other iQuest students, I don't know how it could get any better. The program is so in tune with the ideals of my family. I feel at home at Pisgah and I love the priority it places on God and our family in a learning environment."
